

I've been diagnosed with hearing loss. Now what?

You have hearing loss and need hearing aids. What now?

It's common to struggle with accepting the diagnosis. It might be scary, upsetting or even seem expensive. However, treatment can improve your quality of life and can be a positive experience.

Getting your first hearing aids

Technology has advanced dramatically and hearing aids are more effective than ever.

To recommend a specific model, your hearing health professional will conduct an assessment to address lifestyle needs outside of your hearing abilities such as social life, hobbies, budget and more.

Once selected, you're booked in for a fitting. This will introduce you to your new devices, ensure comfort and program them to your prescription.

There are several follow-up appointments to educate you on important hearing aid care and fine-tune the program(s) based on your feedback. For best results, the hearing aids must be worn regularly.

It can be overwhelming for patients as they adjust. To make the transition comfortable, the process can move as slowly or quickly as you need.

Once you are happy, you can get back to life with support from your hearing clinic.

The next steps

The best part about completing the fitting and programming stage is integrating your new hearing aids into your day-to-day life.

Hearing aids become a tool for success to improve your quality of life and confidence.
